The gold noble coinage (23ct fine, or .995 pure gold) of this reign was officially reduced in weight (from 120 gr. to 108 gr.) early in 1412. The earlier Heavy Coinage varieties, such as the example offered here, all bear one of four initial or mint marks -- the crescent, coronet, star or pellet -- by which they are most easily distinguished from subsequent issues. While the style did not change from that of the previous reign, these were the first gold issues of the House of Lancaster. One of the main purposes of issuing these coins was for merchants’ use in the Flemish weavers’ trade, and in fact since Edward III the noble had existed in large part as an international trade coin, but also of course for homeland banking transactions. Numerous imitations made in Flanders undermined confidence in the wool-for-gold trade in England while in Flanders Flemish law forbade use of the real thing, the English gold coin. In this reign, for over a decade, the English weight remained as it had from the previous reign, but so many imitations circulated in England that a crisis was reached by 1408. The competing coins did not represent the same value in gold content. A decision had to be reached, either to convert the imitations or to bring the English noble to the same gold value. The latter course of action was chosen as most efficacious. Fineness was maintained but the weight was reduced to match that of the Flemish piece. It is uncertain exactly when lighter pieces began to be struck thereafter, but Easter of 1412 marked the official date of change. For the early Heavy Coinage, mintage had slowed to a halt at Calais by 1404, while London Mint production continued albeit much reduced, accounting for the rarity of these coins today. London production began again in considerable numbers following the weight reduction of 1412. This brief period up to 1412 provides modern collectors with one of the most intriguing gold issues for study. Heavy Nobles are rare per se, let alone in such a condition as is seen on this outstanding specimen.

By the early seventeenth century, the gold angel was a seldom seen denomination, not known to most of the population of England. Traditionally it had often been chosen for good luck because St. Michael was considered to be depicted slaying the Devil, and because of this it became the favoured coin for the ancient ‘laying on of hands’ ceremony, in which the king or queen (often symbolically) handed the coin to an ailing subject, who believed in the monarch’s God-given power to heal and generally wore the coin (possessing this power) presented to him around his neck on a ribbon for the rest of his life, in order to keep the Devil and his ailments at bay. Such coins became amulets, never again used as money. When one did appear in the reign of Charles I, it tended to be pierced as a result of this superstitious practice, and in fact many were pierced immediately upon being struck as their intended use was as these ‘touch pieces’. Some researchers believe that the size of the hole indicates how much gold was kept by a jeweller or by the mint as the fee for the service of piercing and providing a ribbon with which to wear such a coin. Angels had also long been popular as good-luck pieces, favoured by sea-faring men and sometimes placed in the hulls of ships.

Little is definitively known about the earliest patterns, where rarity takes on new meaning inasmuch as these pieces tend to trade hands with far less frequency than do milled patterns, which might be equal in rarity yet tend to come up for sale more frequently. The present coin is dramatic in design with a depth of detail seen on almost no other angels, of any period. Peter Woodhead (Schneider Collection, Volume 2, commentary opposite Plate 20) cites research that called this coin a touch piece struck for the Scottish coronation in 1633, while other scholars variously argued for its being a pattern or just a Briot issue, with just 4 examples being known. The fact that this extraordinary piece, most likely never intended for commerce and of special manufacture, was once pierced makes it all the more enchanting, given its sheer rarity. Why it was made is an intriguing thought. Remembering, too, that traditionally legends on coins were chosen to impart good luck, or as blessings upon a reign, the legend here acquires an ironic sentiment for collectors, as it must have in its day among royalists, translating from the Latin to mean ‘The Love of the People Is the King’s Protection’. Within about a decade of the minting of this coin, the people’s protection of their sovereign withered before Cromwell’s army.

£5000-6000

This coin is sold with a copy of a letter from the Royal Mint stating that it is made of fine silver, indicating that it was a special striking, and that it is therefore a very important piece. The writer is unable, however, to explain the significance of the incuse markings that are to be found on the edge of the coin, although a crown dated 1853 in the Mint collection has similar ones. It could have been deliberately marked as a pattern or as a presentation piece.

In 1899 the Kruger pond dies were intercepted by the British in Lourenzo Marques. To mark the wartime re-opening of the Mint it was decided to overstamp 1898 ponds with a 99 below Kruger's bust. The first coin to be processed was stamped with a single 9, but it was then decided to stamp another 130 of the 1898 ponds with a smaller pair of nines. These coins are known as the '99 overstamps' and they were struck with a smaller punch - the 9 measuring about 1.1 mm. These coins are exceptionally rare. This piece is sold with various documents tracing its history since the 1970s, including an enlarged photo signed by Spink and Son stating that the coin is genuine and a copy of Bickels Coin and Medal News where it is pictured on the front cover.
